They are the way to collectively learn from each other about difficult problems. The problem is questions only do so if they are well written. The problem is that, for a lot of people, being well written is difficult. And the problem is that for a lot of people, being able to ask a good question (which isn't well written) is difficult. The problem is that, when both are difficult, the results aren't good. I think it's important to define when you think a question is well written, and when you think it's not. Are there any best practices on when to ask a question? Are there any well established guidelines on how to ask a question that are well vetted by the community? A: It depends on the site, but the basics are: Is the question interesting? Is it answerable? Is it unique? For example, the site I moderate, Stack Overflow, focuses on questions that people are willing to pay money to answer. So it's better to ask questions that you think would be interesting to answer if there were a lot of money involved. This can be good topic questions, but these are very hard to write. So my advice is to ask questions that you'd ask if you were someone else. If you're in the situation where you're having a problem, think about what questions you'd ask if someone else was explaining the situation to you. Edit: The core of
